The Leica Mini Zoom is a 35mm compact point-and-shoot camera produced in the mid 1990s. It features a Vario Elmar 35 - 70mm f/4.0 - 7.6 zoom lens and several basic, common "program modes" including bulb, infinity focus, exposure override, and the like. Understanding the exposure values of the Mini Zoom takes some practice. Aside from bulb mode, the longest exposure automatically attainable ...

The model received adverse comment for it when it was released. This new Leica is slower and its lens hasn't got the excuse of a retracting design intended to make a small flat package. It seems to me that Fuji have re-defined the kit zoom lens with their 18-55 f2.8-4 kit zoom for their X series cameras.

Leica Mini Zoom. The Leica Mini Zoom is probably the most interesting from the Mini series. Zoom lenses usually don't get my favors but this 35-70mm f/4.0-7.6 Vario Elmar seem to be surprisingly sharp. Sure its variable aperture won't compare to fixed lenses but it can cover most situations for the casual shooter who wants good image quality.

Another feature that makes the Minilux Zoom stand out is a hot shoe mount for the Leica CF flash unit (sold separately) in addition to the built-in flash. This allows you to reduce red-eye and light up objects from a greater distance. The Minilux Zoom also offers an active infrared autofocus or manual focusing from about 28 inches to infinity.

The Leica Mini is my first taste of Leica and this great German brand (even though this was made in Japan). I have always wanted a compact 35mm camera that I could carry around my neck at all times or just have it in my pocket or in my camera bag when I'm not shooting film. Now, this camera isn't in

Ok so the 28-70 with speed booster might be a little longer but no wider in diameter. take the same idea but instead make it a smaller F3.5-4.5 design and there should be no problem making the faster lens in the relatively small size of the new Leica without having to resort to a stupid F6.4 at the 46mm end.
